

U.S. jobs data rounds off a positive week for markets

U.S. non-farm payrolls surprised to the upside on Friday, after two months of disappointing readings, sending U.S. investors off on the Bank Holiday weekend in a positive fashion. The U.S. economy added 850,000 jobs in June, which was the most in ten months with numbers for the previous two months were also revised higher. Service sectors of the economy led the gains, which provided further evidence that the parts of the economy hit hardest during the pandemic are gaining momentum. The unemployment rate ticked up slightly to 5.9% as the participation rate (a key metric of those actually seeking work) remained unchanged. Despite the positive reading, it is worth noting that there has still been a net loss of 6.7m jobs since the start of the pandemic, with the lacklustre return to the workforce from workers in some sectors a slight cause for concern.

U.S. housing data was also positive last week with pending home sales rising 8%, versus a consensus expectation of a fall of 1%. Manufacturing data wavered slightly in the U.S., as supply chain issues continue to bite. However, the general consensus is that these issues will ease as lockdowns retreat further globally.

The eurozone also saw a number of positive economic releases with economic confidence rising to its highest level in more than 20 years with sentiment in the services sector rising strongest. German retail sales for May rose over 4% for the month as French household consumption also surpassed expectations. These positive readings from the two largest economies in the currency bloc helped equities rise across the week. The rise of the 'delta variant' of the COVID-19 virus continues to cause concern globally. However, with the accelerating rollout of vaccine, the impact on investment markets in the developed world has been muted so far.
