

Market rally stalls on strong economic data

The recent market rally in US equities stalled last week on the back of strong economic indicators which did little to dampen inflation expectations. On Tuesday, the US ISM Non-Manufacturing PMI showed an expansion in services. Likewise on Wednesday the US Jobless Claims report displayed a still tight labour market rising by 4,000 jobless claims, in what is considered to be a moderate level of increase. The week was rounded off by the release of the Producer Price Index which rose by 0.3% for November. This exceeded expectations and highlights some persistent inflation in the US. Markets are awaiting an interest rate decision from the Federal Reserve this week which is widely expected to be lower at 0.5% than the previous 4 rounds of 0.75% increases. Some investors have now begun to forecast the possibility of a prolonged period of Fed tightening amid recent optimism about slowing monetary policy. In reaction, US equities lost -1.7% in Euro terms, the first weekly fall in three weeks in Euro terms. US Treasuries also sold off as a result with the benchmark US 10 Year Treasury yield gaining 2 basis points to finish the week at 3.54%.

In Europe equities also finished the week down albeit at a softer pace, losing -0.5% for the week. This comes as both the ECB and Bank of England are set to make interest rate decisions in the coming week. Market trepidation still exists as Eurozone inflation remains at a higher level than in the US. In Asia, Equities have risen considerably the relaxing of China's Zero-Covid policy continues to be a source of optimism for economic growth in the region. The world's second largest economy is expected to fully reopen in early 2023 despite a recent uptick in infections. Hong Kong equities gained 3.1% last week in Euro terms.
