

Strong earnings see tech stocks rally

Last week ended in positive territory for equities as corporate earnings in the US surpassed expectations. Most notable perhaps, was American Chipmaker Nvidia, which following the release of strong figures, added $277 Billion to its market capitalisation. The optimism surrounding Nvidia, and other companies connected with Artificial Intelligence lead a broad market rally towards the end of the week with US stocks closing the week up 1.1% in Euro terms. In terms of economic data, the holiday-shortened week saw a relatively light schedule, however the release of manufacturing and services PMIs saw an unexpected uptick in manufacturing activity. The figures, released by S&P Global on Thursday showed that manufacturing increased to 51.5 from a previous figure of 50.7, its highest level since 2022. Services activity declined slightly to 51.3, whilst both figures remain in expansionary territory (above the level of 50). Thursday also saw the release of Initial Jobless Claims figures from the Bureau of Labor Statistics. The report indicated a tight labour market, with weekly claims for unemployment coming in at 201,000, below the previous figure of 213,000 and below economists' consensus expectations of 217,000.

In Europe, figures confirmed that Germany's GDP (Gross Domestic Product) shrank by -0.3% in the final quarter of 2023. Preceding this, Germany revised its GDP forecast for 2024 downwards to 0.2% from a previous estimate of 1.3%. Last week also saw the release of Eurozone PMIs which displayed an uptick in services activity back into expansionary territory. Figures showed that Eurozone services now stand at 50.0, up from 48.4. The stronger than expected survey caused some investors to show concern for potential inflationary pressures with bond yields rising as a result. In the UK, PMI data also demonstrated an increase in demand, with the composite PMI figure which contains both services and manufacturing activity, rising to 53.3 from 52.9.
