Markets endured a tough start to the week following the escalation of the trade tariff dispute between U.S. and China, but softer tones emanated from both sides by mid-week. Optimism rebounded as the week progressed and stocks had enjoyed their best week in nearly three months by the close on Friday evening. Trading volumes are also expected to pick up with the closing out of the summer holidays. Eurozone data was mixed, with German data disappointing as inflation data hovered stubbornly around 1% - well below the 2% target. Finally, the Brexit saga continues to rumble on as Prime Minister Johnson 'prorogued' parliament; ending the current session. In practical terms, it means parliament won't meet until the middle of October, with opponents claiming the move is an attempt to stifle the Brexit debate in parliament. Westminster is likely to see some further developments this week, but global markets have so far been largely unaffected.
