The European Council meeting begins with Brexit the main point on the agenda.

Stocks finished the week on a high after the U.S. and China agreed on outlines to a new trade deal. This includes a doubling of Chinese purchases of American agricultural products. Whether this proves to be the end of the tensions remains to be seen. U.S. economic data was fragile last week, as inflation figures, small business confidence, and hiring expectations all dropped. Eurozone data wasn't much better with German factory orders declining in September. Positive developments in the Brexit talks helped lift U.K. and Irish stocks late last week, although some stumbling blocks have materialised over the weekend. Finally, the U.S. Federal Reserve issued a positive surprise to markets with the announcement that it will begin to expand its balance sheets from the middle of this week, in an effort to shore up the banking reserve framework.
