PMI data from the U.S., eurozone, and U.K. all goes to print.

Most major markets were in positive territory for the week as the S&P 500 came within 0.2% of its all-time high before falling back. However, a weaker dollar dampened returns for Irish investors in U.S. assets. Markets got a brief boost on a Russian announcement that a vaccine (labelled 'Sputnik') had been approved, although enthusiasm waned as concerns over the approval process emerged.

In Europe, officials in France, Italy, and Spain have rolled back the relaxing of some restrictions, acknowledging that cases are rising once again. In general, high-frequency indicators signal slowdown as virus case numbers show a resurgence. In the U.S., there are growing concerns for the consumer as politicians continue to negotiate on an aid package - the economy does not look able to stand on its own two feet at this juncture. Even with President Trump ordering to reinstate the supplemental unemployment benefits at $400 per week, consumers may pull back on consumption in the near-term on the back of the growing uncertainty. Nancy Pelosi has also recalled the House of Representatives to vote on protections for the U.S. Postal Service as tension on the subject mounts. There are concerns that this could spill over into stimulus talks. Commentary from the Federal Reserve last week continued the recent trend of emphasising the role that fiscal support can play in a sustained recovery.

U.S. economic data was positive, with Retail Sales rising once again, albeit much lower than the surges seen in June and July. Chinese economic data jumped sharply in Q2 and a more modest gain for the second half of the year now forecast – positive GDP growth for 2020 as a whole is plausible.
