

Equities march higher as US economy starts to fire

Equities hit a record high in the US on Thursday, before markets closed for Good Friday. A slew of positive economic releases were digested by investors last week, with optimism on the rise as the public health position continues to improve stateside. US non-farm payrolls for March came in at 916,000 which denotes a significant pickup from January and February (which were both in fact revised upwards). The unemployment rate also moved lower to 6%, as labour supply starts to move back towards pre-pandemic levels.

PMI data also added to the good mood, with US manufacturing rising to 64.7, the highest reading since 1983. This was surpassed by the services reading, released yesterday, which came in at 63.7 – the highest reading in the survey’s history. This is good news of course, as this segment of the economy has suffered more from lockdown and social distancing restrictions. It also correlated with some of the non-farm payroll data, which showed that leisure and hospitality created the most jobs, as US states begin to fully reopen. Finally, for the US, President Biden announced a $2.25 trillion infrastructure strategy, entitled ‘The American Jobs Plan’ (AJP) which did little to dampen the optimistic mood in markets.

Eurozone data also proved positive with confidence climbing as both manufacturing and services PMIs in March were in expansion territory. Inflation also moved higher in March to 1.3%, according to an initial estimate. However, there is a more cautious tone amongst eurozone investors as the strength of any recovery remains very much based on the efficacy of vaccine rollout programmes. Finally, bond yields (which have garnered much attention in recent weeks) stabilised on both sides of the Atlantic as comments from both the Fed and ECB in respect to QE programmes kept yields anchored.
