

Another “Magnificent” week

The Fed will meet this week, and the market’s confidence in a 25-bps rate cut was strengthened after the CPI release on Wednesday. As anticipated, headline CPI rose to an annual rate of 2.7% for November, up from October’s 2.6% reading. Investors began to price in a rate cut due to an absence of any surprises in the data. The Nasdaq closed above 20,000 for the first time, while Tesla, Meta, and Alphabet all set their own record highs. However, long-dated treasury bond yields (which move inversely to price) were on the rise last week, reflecting the fading confidence of further rate cuts in 2025. Nvidia shares finished the week down more than 3% after China announced they would be launching an anti-trust probe into the company. The Bank of Canada lowered rates by a half-point last week, marking its fifth cut since June.

The European Central Bank (ECB) decided to reduce interest rates by 25-bps on Thursday, and their statement also implied a more dovish outlook. The cut was in-line with expectations, resulting in a muted reaction that saw the DAX 40 and Euro Stoxx 50 finishing the week relatively flat. The Euro was on the defensive last week, touching a December low against the dollar. The Swiss National Bank also cut their main rate by 50-bps to 0.5%.

In the UK, GDP figures were released on Friday that showed the economy had unexpectedly shrunk for the second month running in October. The chancellor, Rachel Reeves, expressed her disappointment but stressed that the new government’s policies are more focused on “long-term economic growth”. The data sparked recession fears, and 10-year gilt yields finished the week higher.

Top leaders in China announced they would be shifting their monetary policy to “moderately loose” for the first time in 14 years on Monday. Chinese government bond prices continued to push higher as investors looked to lock in higher yields with expected rate cuts on the horizon.

Fact of the week

The world’s oldest active bond, which was originally sold in the Netherlands, celebrated its 400th birthday last week.
