

Global equities fall as trade war looms

US stocks rallied on Monday following indications from US President Trump that tariffs may be more targeted than anticipated. However, just when there were hopes that the US market was beginning to regain its old moxie, weak consumer confidence readings released on Tuesday hampered the mood. Consumer confidence slid to its lowest level since January 2021, and the public's expectations for the economy's future also disappointed, falling to a 12-year low. This came after manufacturing PMI readings for March had already underperformed consensus estimates. On Wednesday, Trump announced 25% tariffs on car imports, making an incipient trade war more likely. There was also a sell-off in AI stocks during the week after Microsoft announced it was abandoning certain AI data centre projects. On Friday, PCE inflation data came in hotter than anticipated, with prices growing 2.8% YoY in February vs 2.7% expected. Overall, US equities finished the week down -1.7% in euro terms. 10-year treasury yields were volatile as investors digested the various economic indicators and ultimately finished the week flat.

In the Eurozone, PMI output data showed that business activity rose for a third consecutive month in March. Meanwhile, German business sentiment improved in March, with the ifo Business Climate Index rising to 86.7 from 85.3 in February, the highest it's been in seven months. Despite the strong indicators, European equities fell following Trump's announcement of auto tariffs, ending the week down nearly -1.8%.

In the UK, a CPI release showed that inflation cooled in February to 2.8% YoY from 3% in January, beating expectations of 2.9%. Chancellor Rachel Reeves delivered her spring statement on Wednesday, and listeners were keen to catch any updates on the government's outlook on an economy that has struggled so far in 2025. She announced a slew of spending cuts but also outlined additional military funding.
