

The indomitable consumer spirit

European stocks opened strongly last Monday after US President Trump postponed 50% tariffs on the EU over the preceding weekend. US markets were closed for Memorial Day but quickly followed suit on Tuesday. The risk-on sentiment was boosted after reports emerged that Japanese authorities would consider issuing fewer long-dated bonds, causing yields in these offerings to fall sharply, tempering fears of a carry trade unwind. This led less dramatic reductions in long-term yields across several major economies. On Wednesday, Nvidia reported revenue growth of the number of unemployed rising by 34,000 that sparked a rally in the AI bellwether. However, the optimistic mood was cut short on Friday when Trump announced he would double the tariff on steel and aluminium imports to 50%, amid news that trade talks between the US and China had stalled. This came despite the US Trade Court ruling that the president's levies were illegal just a few days prior.

After months of anxiety and scepticism surrounding tariffs, US consumer confidence rebounded in May, coming in well ahead of projections as it jumped to 98 from 85.7 in April, which had been its lowest reading since 2020. Inflation data was also positive, with the headline PCE price index rate for April falling to 2.1% from 2.3% and beating expectations of 2.2%. However, the Federal Open Market Committee is still expected to hold rates steady when they meet again on 11th June.

In the Eurozone, the economic sentiment indicator improved to 94.8 in May, above forecasts of 94.0, having fallen in the two months previous. In Germany, unemployment grew faster than anticipated in May, with the number of unemployed rising by 34,000, ahead of consensus estimates of 10,000. Meanwhile, German inflation eased to 2.1% in May from 2.2% in April, although the reading was higher than expectations for 2.0%.

Fact of the week

The historically strong relationship between the US dollar and Treasury yields has broken down, with the correlation between the two at its weakest in nearly three years.
