

Markets little changed in advance of French election

Week in Review

- Towards the end of last week, all eyes were on the first round of the French elections, which took place yesterday. Major exchanges traded in tight ranges, with investors unwilling to put on large positions before the vote.
- The initial reaction to the vote this morning has been positive for risk assets. The second round run off looks set to be between Marine Le Pen, and the more market friendly and poll-topping Emmanuel Macron, with Mr. Macron the current favourite.
- UK equities were hit as Prime Minister Teresa May announced a snap election to be held on 8 June, which caught investors by surprise. However, Sterling strengthened in the wake of the announcement; paring the losses to eurozone investors.
- In economic news, US inflation data was weaker than forecast, which may pare back market expectations for the reflation trade. Q1 earnings continue to be released, with nearly four out of five companies that have reported coming in above market estimates.
