Week in Review

- The dominate event during last week was the US Federal Reserve announcement that it was to begin reducing its massive bond portfolio, amassed since the financial crisis. The move had been well telegraphed, with the Fed reluctant to surprise markets. The world's most influential central bank also lowered its inflation forecasts somewhat, but remained broadly positive on the outlook for both unemployment and economic growth.
- It was a choppy, but positive, week overall for equity investors as US President Trump announced further sanctions against North Korea, whilst striking a less than conciliatory tone with his debut speech at the UN General Assembly. The North Korean authorities' response has led to a further escalation of tensions in the region.
- Global bonds had sold off on the more hawkish commentary from a number of central banks over the past fortnight, but found some support over the last seven days on the back of heightened geopolitical concerns.

The global index moved higher last week, returning a positive 0.3%. Gold and Copper both faltered, returning -1.7% and -0.2% respectively.

Oil continued its recent upward trend, returning 1.5% whilst closing above $50 per barrel. The influential US ten year bond yield moved to 2.25% from 2.20%, on the more hawkish sentiment from the Fed. The German equivalent stood at 0.45% from 0.43% a week ago.

The Week Ahead

Thursday 28 September	Friday 29 September	Friday 29 September
The consensus expects the final US GDP figures for Q2 to be confirmed at 3.0% (quarter-on-quarter).	Eurozone 'flash' inflation data for September goes to print where the market expects a figure of 1.6% (year-on-year), up slightly from an August reading of 1.5%.	Final UK GDP figures for Q217 are also released, where the market forecasts no change from the previously released figure of 0.3% (quarter-on-quarter).
