Week in Review

- It was a light week of trading as the approaching Thanksgiving holiday in the US garnered attention, with trading volumes 20% below the monthly average. However, stocks on both sides of the Atlantic still moved higher, as the S&P 500 hit a fresh record high last Tuesday.
- The latest Fed minutes did nothing to dissuade the market of the prospect of a December rate hike, although the slightly 'dovish' tone of some of the commentary led to a fall in the US dollar versus its peers, most notably the euro. The single currency was also supported by news from Germany that the risk of another election had dissipated somewhat.
- Consumer sentiment in the US for November dipped slightly, however this follows October's 13 year high. The Conference Board's index of leading economic indicators increased sharply, suggesting the improved economic backdrop is set to continue.
